

One wedding, four views.

Run it from the product, not from slides. The coordinator's own wedding if they'll give you one; the seeded wedding if not.

0:00	Open on the enquiry. "A couple emails you on a Tuesday." Capture it in notes — three seconds, while they watch. Say nothing else; the speed is the point.
1:00	The note becomes the run-sheet. Extract to tasks. One owner, one date, per task. "Someone should sort the DJ is how things fall apart — a name and a date is how they don't."
2:30	Share the timeline. Open the couple's view. "This is what they see — with your venue's name on it. This link replaces 'wait, what's happening when?'"
4:00	The morning view. Open signal. "Tomorrow morning, this shows the one thing that needs you. That's the whole product: the status meeting that never had to happen."
5:00	Stop demoing. Hand them the one-pager. Ask what a normal wedding week looks like for them — then be quiet and listen.
6:30	The ask. "One wedding, one coordinator, two weeks — then you decide." Book the pilot before you leave the room.

Never argue — agree, then show.

"Why not just a spreadsheet?"

A spreadsheet is where the plan lives; this is where the plan is seen — by the couple, with your name on it, without anyone asking you for the link twice.

"Our couples won't use software."

They already do — the group chat; this just gives the decisions somewhere calmer to live than message forty-seven.

"We already have a system that works."

Keep it — the pilot runs one wedding alongside it, and if your system wins, you've lost nothing but two weeks of watching.

"What happens to our data?"

It's yours: your venue's workspaces, exportable, deletable, hosted in the EU — and we put that in writing before the pilot starts.

"€1,500 is a lot."

Across a season it's a few euro per wedding — less than one centrepiece — for a couple-facing experience that carries your name all year.

If an objection isn't on this page, don't improvise a claim — say "let me check and come back to you today," and do.
