

Why this was built — and why Limerick.

It started with a venue forty-seven days from an event, with no single source of truth. The schedule lived in an email thread, the supplier list in a spreadsheet, the changes in a group chat — and one person carrying all of it in her head. Nothing about that venue was disorganised. The tools were.

Ethan McNamara had spent his career inside large companies — Apple, then Verizon — as a certified Project Management Professional and Lean Six Sigma Black Belt. The software he used at work was built for people like him. The people running weddings, venues and committees have the same coordination problem and none of the tooling — because most of the projects in this country never get called one.

So he built the software those projects deserve: four products, one calm system. Signal Notes catches the thing in three seconds. Signal Tasks turns it into a run-sheet. Signal Timeline shows everyone one plan. Signal opens the morning with the one thing due today. Built in the evenings, alongside the corporate role, until all four were live.

It launches from Limerick because that is where it was built, and because the way this company grows is a hundred deep local relationships, not a million impressions. Built in Limerick. Proven in Limerick. Expanded from Limerick.
